put: (N.B.—1. In translating this word, care must be taken to distinguish the cases in which it is followed by a true preposition, governing a noun, from those in which it is compounded with a separable particle, the noun being the object to the compound verb: e.g. Case 1, the load was put on the horse: Case 2, he put on his hat: but, for convenience of reference, we shall put most examples of the former kind under the heads of the latter. 2. The word is so general in its use, that in many passages it must be expressed with the context, and not by any verbal equivalent. 3. Its two chief uses, referring to state and place, are too much mixed up in Latin to be put under separate heads: cf. esp. TO PLACE.) 1. do, dĕdi, dăre, dătum (rt.
